"Boiled in Oil" is the second volume in Melanie Anne Phillips' Transition Trilogy - three books that form the first part of her ongoing series of books called Transition, Transformation and Transcendence, which explores transgender issues through her personal experiences. As this book begins Melanie has just returned from sex reassignment surgery to re-unite with her wife and children. In addition, she immediately resumes her work as the co-creator of a new theory of story structure called Dramatica and a software tool for writers bearing the same name. Pressure builds from her personal and professional lives as she struggles to explore intimacy with both men and women while maintaining her marriage and to develop a wholly new psychological paradigm for the mechanism of dramatics. "Boiled in Oil" may be an even more valuable book than the first in the series, Raised by Wolves, because it explores the aftermath and ramifications of sex change, rather than focusing on the act itself.
