The Color of Love Ty Mitchell

Bartending at The Spot in Los Angeles was a temporary gig for starving artist Daisy. Whether that meant catching her big break or burning the place down, she was determined to color the world w?th her paintings. Arson seemed like the less likely of the two when she learned that a frequent patron, Mike, was an agent with top-shelf connections in the art world.

Stepping out of her comfort zone, she agrees to meet with him at a concert. On the night of the concert, Daisy greets Mike with an unexpected surprise. He knew that she was bringing someone, but he never expected this. What was more surprising was the implications after the confusion was cleared.

With his ego crushed, Mike agrees with his friends an almost impossible wager to prove that he hasn't lost his touch: take Daisy to bed in exchange for hefty penalties for each individual.

With aspirations of opening her first art gala with a bang, Daisy, unsuspecting of the bet, plays into Mike's suave advances. She spends personal time with him, they become business partners, and she even meets his mother all in the name of career advancement.

But little do they both know that their ulterior motives will bring them closer together in ways they never anticipated. The consequences ultimately test Daisy's integrity, relationships, and life as she searches for who she really is.
